

To whom it may concern,

I am an Indiana resident and just heard some news that really upset me. I heard that the Consumer Bankers Association (CBA) wants to impose the "established business relationship" exemption. I chose to be on a no call list so that I wouldn't receive intrusive calls anymore. The one thing I don't understand is why they (CBA or any other retailer) would want to call people who have made an effort to keep people from calling them. Do they really think they can sell something to someone they have angered by calling?

Sincerely,
Neil Greer
